

Full Moon Over Hoi An 6.000

Watermelon | sweet basil | palm sugar | tamarind | Soda

The Full Moon Festival of Hoi An is held each month on the eve of a full moon. After the sun sets the whole city will light candles and place them into colorful lanterns, which are then placed into the river and let to run downstream as an offering and worship to their ancestors and the God of the land. Most Vietnamese festivals involve offerings to the spirit world, celebrations of life, or commemorations of the dead, so weddings and funerals in Vietnam are both joyous occasions, and it is sometimes difficult to work out which one you are witnessing.

Pipe Down in The Back 6.000

Green apple | Spiced pineapple juice | Lime juice

A back-street driver is a phrase coined in the 1920s for when a passenger legitimately directed a chauffeur. Today we use the phrase to depict a passenger who criticizes the skills of the driver, with it also taking a more figurative meaning of a person who interferes in affairs without having knowledge, responsibility, or authority for doing so.

The Magic Number 6.000

Honeydew melon | Jasmine | Passionfruit

China is full of superstition with hundreds of different folklore's written into history and none more so than the belief in lucky and unlucky numbers. It is customary to regard even numbers as being more auspicious than odd ones with gifts being given in even numbers on all occasions. No. 8 has long been regarded as the luckiest number in Chinese culture. With the pronunciation of 'Ba' in Chinese, no. 8 sounds like the word 'Fa', which means to make a fortune. It has been known for people to pay a great deal more for phone numbers that contain the number 8 and for flats that are located on the 8th floor.
